PRESS RELEASE

No. 922/2015

Date: 22nd December 2015

Command Paper for Consultation on Marriage Act

The Government has completed drafting amendments to the Marriage Act to enable the consultation process to start on the possibility of legalising civil marriage between same sex couples.

This reflects the policy of the Government that such a consultation process should be commenced by the issue of a Command Paper.

The draft Bill to amend the Marriage Act, which is how the change to the law would be made, has today been published as a Command Paper. The Command Paper is available online: <http://www.gibraltarlaws.gov.gi/commandpapers/C14-2015.pdf>

This is the start of the consultation in the legislative process. This stage is before the proposal becomes a Bill for consideration and debate in Parliament.

The standard time frame of two weeks, which has been the norm for Command Papers, has been extended to three weeks in this instance as a result of the Christmas break.

The Minister for Equality, the Hon Samantha Sacramento MP, said: "The Government is committed, as set out in the GSLP-LIBERAL manifesto, to publish this Command Paper in order to consider the views of the public in a wide consultation on the introduction of equality in respect of civil marriage. The proposed amendments to the legislation do not impose or require changes on the part of any religious denomination to their practices, beliefs or sacraments, none of which will be at all affected by the proposals we are consulting on as part of this consultation exercise. This is a major piece of legislation which will promotes the principle of equal treatment of citizens under the law. The Government is pleased to have progressed this matter through the drafting stage in less than a month after the General Election. I am looking forward to considering the views of the public in respect of this proposal."
